WHY YOU SHOULD ATTEND

We all understand the theoretical benefits of performance management – the way it lies at the centre of learning, reward, career management and etc, and also acts as the basis for improving the performance of the business. The fact, however, is that it hardly ever acts as it's supposed to.

If there is one process in HR or even across the whole of business that most organisations would agree is broken, it would surely be employee performance management. Nothing else we do turns both managers and employees off so much, or results in so much wasted time (mainly through poor application and ineffectual conversations, but often not helped by bureaucratically heavy designs).

Yet it should not be like this. Employee performance management should be an absolutely critical business process or approach. It should provide the main mechanism that an organisation needs to ensure that work is performed and objectives are achieved effectively.

But after 30 years of trying, we cannot go on making incremental improvements that do little to reduce frustration or increase impact on business performance. It's time to either seriously transform or just trash it!

The good news is that there are things that can be done to make a major difference here. New insights from business and psychological research, new ways of thinking, and new technologies provide some new and significant opportunities for improvement.

The course now also contains specific focus on employer branding during and beyond the coronavirus pandemic crisis, for example by enabling people to take responsibility for their own performance and encouraging managers to trust them, even though they cannot see what they are doing. It will also review how performance management processes and technologies can be used and updated for remote working.

COURSE OUTLINE

TIME	AGENDA
Session One	Monday 5 October 2020
9.30am	Why traditional performance management is not working, and insights on making it work better Most organisations in many countries around the world have tended to manage performance in fairly similar ways. This includes annual objective setting and appraisal, perhaps with ongoing feedback and more regular reviews, and sometimes the addition of competencies and behaviours, calibration reviews and a few other activities. This process is generally if rather problematically used to drive both development activities and the differentiation of rewards. This session will review the pros but also the cons of this traditional approach: <ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>• Elements of traditional performance management - reviewing participants own experience and summarising the key challenges</li><li>• Case study and research evidence including insights from neuroscience (eg on feedback and the threat state)</li><li>• Responding to changes in the world of work including the needs for agility, collaboration and dealing with complexity as well as the potential for using new technologies</li><li>• The need to respond to different organizational contexts, including Asia vs the West, small vs large organisations, government vs private sector, etc</li><li>• Developing objectives and principles for re-engineering performance management in participants' own organisations.</li></ul> Case study: Deloitte Singapore
10.45am	Break
11.00am	What to do to make traditional performance management work as well as possible! Some organisations are radically overhauling their performance management approach (see next section) however most are focusing on improving and tailoring their existing process to provide better experience for employees and a better connection to strategic priorities for the business. This session will cover the main opportunities for making these incremental improvements: <ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>• Dealing with the difficulties in understanding performance eg identifying who is talent in our organisations</li><li>• Dealing with the difficulties in performance management dynamics – linking employee and business performance, cascading objectives, calibrating performance etc</li><li>• Adding in employee experience and engagement - clarifying the deal</li><li>• Advantages and disadvantages of dropping / maintaining ratings and rankings</li></ul> Case study: Accenture ASEAN
12.30pm	Lunch

1.30pm

How to abolish performance management (or at least reviews / appraisals)

Some organisations are also taking a more radical approach to performance management by abolishing the process. This does not mean they are not managing performance. They just believe traditional performance management gets in the way of managing performance effectively. Whilst this may not be the main opportunity for many participants it is still useful to learn about what makes abolishing performance management possible, in order to further support improvements in the traditional process:

- How to ensure people manage their performance without a performance management process including end of year reviews
- What to do instead, including developing individual responsibility, team level reviews and relying on recognition
- Developing a performance culture and the roles of obliquity and emergence
- Responding to new business agendas including agile, user experience and gamification
- Case studies and the conflicting research on organisations that have abolished performance management

Case Studies and Examples in Best Fit Alignment

The new world of work presents various interesting challenges which HR needs to deal with. However, it also offers new opportunities for meeting objectives and undertaking activities in more efficient and effective ways. This session will review these opportunities and the impacts they are having on performance management. In addition, the session will consider how participants can identify a best fit approach to performance management in their own organisations:

- Debundling performance management to meet specific organizational objectives
- The need to move beyond best practices to identify a best fit approach for a particular organisation
- Linking the approach to objectives, principles and employee expectations
- Case studies and potential examples
- A process for participants to use to identify an optimal approach for their business and workforce based upon line manager capability, technology savvy and other factors

Case studies: Microsoft, DBS Bank

3.30pm

5 Designing and implementing the new approach

To be effective, changes to performance management need to involve managers and employees in helping both shape and embed the approach. Organisations are increasingly using techniques such as design thinking to ensure their new systems meet the needs of the people who will be using them, not just achieving what the business wants.

- Identifying a best fit approach to performance management and dealing with trade offs
- Using approaches like design thinking to identify the way forward
- Managing diversity - tailoring performance management for different employee requirements
- Managing the change process involved in introducing a new approach
- Building the required HR and line management competencies
- How to use performance management to inform learning and development, talent management, and succession planning processes etc
- How to use performance management to inform assessment, reward, poor performance and promotion processes
- What to do for pay when there is no performance management process / end of year appraisal or performance rating

Conclusion and action planning

4.30 pm – End of virtual session
